SuperStream standards

The Australian Taxation Office (ATO) has recently written to certain trustees of self managed super funds (SMSF) regarding changes to processing employer super contributions under SuperStream.

The letter advised that SMSF trustees who are preparing to receive super contributions from an employer with 20 or more employees will need to provide their employer with the following information:

- the SMSF's ABN
- the SMSF's bank account or BPAY payment details for receiving contribution payments
- the electronic service address of their nominated electronic message service provider for receiving contribution data messages.

How does this affect employers?

Under the SuperStream standard, employers contributing to superannuation on behalf of their employees must do so by sending contribution data and associated payments electronically to their employee's superannuation fund.

Where an employee has requested employer contributions be paid to their SMSF, employers may need to collect and store the above SMSF information to be able to send contribution data and payments electronically to the fund in accordance with the SuperStream standard.

There's no prescribed format for employees to provide this SMSF information to their employers and the ATO has requested employers to support various channels including email to receive this information.

Employers are also encouraged to talk to their HR or payroll solution provider about how to store and integrate the new data within their HR or payroll software.
